Managing Differences through Workplace Inclusion

Deborah Van Huis, M.S.

Workshop Description

In a business world where employees are expected to do more with less and bring rain during droughts, it is imperative that resources are managed effectively. In most organizations, compensation accounts for 60 – 80% of expenses. That is why managers who want to be successful and coworkers who want to get promoted must search and discover the value that fellow team members possess. Often, finding greater value in your workforce requires working with individuals who come from very different backgrounds or represent diverse points of view. These team members may be different in physical appearance, psychological makeup and often possess unique untapped skills. Differences may also cause conflict within the organization. If not well managed, diversity can lead to disruption or dissention as groups move toward “us vs. them.” This may ultimately lead to lost time and productivity, not to mention legal action and lawsuits. Managing Differences through Workplace Inclusion gives the participant a top line understanding of how to capitalize on the value of differences and how to turn that increased productivity into increased revenue, lower costs and improved workplace dynamics.
